A STUDY OF GRIEF

I.

You walk over to an empty bar stool,

Etta James blaring from a speaker some honeyed words uttered with a kind of eloquence made possible only
by rain,

tiny droplets drumming beats to a window, tapping Morse code for are you alright?
where a hooded grief takes the seat next to yours.

You do not welcome grief's company, but his is a language where no means yes and yes, anyway, sips gold liquid and insists small talk while you spit blood with every answer from your alcohol-parched mouth, his line of questioning a forceful inquiry into your joy:

But why? You have so many reasons to be happy.

II.

Here is a pamphlet.
Like many of its kind,
it will tell you what to do.
It will know exactly what to do.

It will tell you of resilience and laughter in children's lungs as they drink gutter water and play naked through the flood.

It will tell you of lost people:
lost mothers, fathers, of lost limbs, how hope is a blue pill
you purchase on eBay,

drink knowing that the world is far too tired to have any room left for grief, and you will believe it. You will believe it when it tells you to take grief in a box, ship grief off somewhere distant, limpid cold, except everything we send skyward eventually finds its way back.

You are lucky if it doesn't land on your delicate head.

III.

Of all things, grief understands this most:

the only thing that separates the departed from the disappeared are the footprints pressed on moist terrain.

Welcome to the factory of alleged virtues.

Here, everything you've lost is found, only better.
Like polished chrome, watch as grief glistens

in the high tide of the morning, on stage at a talent show, dripping wet from a pulpit over Sunday's homily.

Grief comes to you
unabandoned,
unabashed,
weighs your pockets down heavy as a missing organ and yet shinier than ever. This is where grief comes to die, to be reborn and baptized new; a teething infant eager to suckle your light, swirl you gentle on his tongue as you dissolve.

PAINT BY NUMBERS AS VAN GOGH

I once was asked on a job interview to describe the color blue to a blind man, to which I responded with a resounding no, I said what sick man would I be if I lied? The truth is, who knows for sure how blue looks? Like right now, as I glance at the sky hand-painted on this marvelous box, I see a flurry of blueness —eight different kinds numbered differently, the opacity to which they've found their resolve.

Some even a little green. You can place next to it a picture of the sea perched perfectly still, and I wouldn't know the difference for what is the sky but just an ocean without gravity to hold it back?

Eleven stars and a moon—now this, I can tell clearly, is a starry night, an approximation of all the dark we've abandoned in the day, blueness whirling around yellow dots as if to devour them.

Such carnivorous display twinkling above cities whose hues and pigments pulsate under the tyranny of math—three for blue, four for another kind of blue, and so on. So tell me, how am I to describe the color blue to a blind man in all its forms? Six is also blue, and so is seven. Instead, I turn to the cypress tree black and sullen in its singular hush of dark, its tree bark clawing up the rectangular frame as if to say here dear blue, devour me, too.
